Background

This participant is currently working from home. They have a dedicated office space for working from home. They do not have anyone in the same room during work hours, they have 2 children and a spouse. When done work for the day, they do not do anything to transition. They immediately move into chores or making dinner (no transition). Close laptop and leave the room. Would like to feel confident that they got all the work done and nothing needs to be worked on further for the day.

CHALLENGES

Main pain points:

- no clear boundaries between “work time” and “personal time”
- Previous toxic work environment made them feel like they always had to be on the clock

Frustrations:

- Checks or replies to work outside of work hours
- Does “just one more thing” in off work hours
- Feels guilty if they do not reply to notifications outside of work hours
- previous boss would get angry if did not work outside of the usual working hours - created anxiety

When asked the question: Describe a time you felt frustrated by the lack of separation between home life and personal life. What happened?

Participant responded: “Needed a clearer boundary of when work hours were complete”
